Designed for OS X 10.4 or greater on Intel x86 machines, it is a free download from the developer's website and can be launched automatically by a hot key. When triggered the program instantly generates a unique key which is displayed as a series of digits, letters or characters from those available on the keyboard at that moment. The user then has an opportunity to copy this unique key into the clipboard to wherever it may be needed including emails and forum posts as well as storing it as a text file within the program itself. The program can be used as a prank or to simply help users remember important keys which may be needed to access certain systems as well as to enhance their own unique style whether it be as part of a forum posting, chat, email or blog. The program also features an option to generate thousands of keys with one click using the "Generate 20,000 Keys" feature. Each key generated is unique and is displayed in the same manner (if desired) before they are all copied to the clipboard in one go. The user is free to select their own code format (e.g. letters or numbers) and generate any number of keys required in order to share with friends in an instant message or via email. The program has been used to insert a number of key generators into digital online forums. In addition to generating keys for sharing with friends, many users have also found the tool useful in creating unique codes for their own use such as interesting phrases and quotes which may be added to forum postings around the web. The program has been used by a number of professional artists and software designers around the world including a recognized graffiti artist known as P1st who appeared on a BBC news segment discussing or creating his own unique codes.
